Reading the Pre-Columbian Landscape

Everyone will say: This land, so recently a waste, is now like a garden, and the ruined cities once abandoned and levelled to the ground are now strongholds with people living in them.

Cover: Wreathed in smoke, members of the Carmel Hill, California Department of Forestry and Fire Protection conduct a burn on a pasture recently seeded with native grasses at Oak Ridge Ranch near Carmel Valley, California. Largely overlooked until recently, the native grasslands of the West Coast have been receiving increased attention from restorationists, and techniques, often adapted versions of techniques developed by restorationists working on prairies in the Midwest, are rapidly being developed for returning native grasses to the golden hills of California. For an overview of progress in this area, see the story by Mark Stromberg and Paul Kephart on page 102.
