Note: The editors of Ecological Restoration/North America would like to alert readers that while many of our nursery advertisers sell only seeds and plants native to their region, some others may sell non-native species or native species from outside their region. While we try to be selective about our advertisers and want to promote the use of local native plants, we cannot guarantee the authenticity of propagules from any nursery. Therefore, we recommend that you talk with nursery operators if you have any questions about the source of seeds or plants for your restoration project. Similarly, references to products by brandname or trademark does not imply an endorsement by the editors or publishers of this journal.

Cover Photo: Mid-November in Wisconsin: A group of volunteers at the International Crane Foundation near Baraboo sow a seed mix similar to the type proposed by Scott Weber in his article on page 196. Weber, who operates a prairie nursery not far from the ICF, favors late fall plantings of locally-collected or locally-grown seed mixes that have lesser amounts of aggressive, native species and favor "conservative" species, especially forbs.

Correction:

The photo caption on page 121 of the fall issue of Ecological Restoration was incorrect. It should have read: Members of the Coconino County Rural Development Corp worked with students in the Ecological Restoration Program at Northern Arizona University on the restoration treatments to thin and remove trees from the Sinclair Wash Project site.
