Cover:

The corrugations of old furrows still mark the land in the Sonoran desert near Phoenix decades after abandonment, and natural revegetation is painfully—often invisibly—slow. Research is now underway to find ways of hastening recovery of ecosystems on thousands of square kilometers of such land in the Santa Cruz Valley. A report on results so far begins on page 71. The plant in the foreground is tumbleweed, or Russian thistle (Salsola kali).
